Human hair, including axillary and pubic hairs and scalp hair, was immersed in an ethanol-saline (1:1) solution and then examined microscopically, by staining with toluidine blue for lipid or with Sudan IV for fat. The appearance of the stratum lucidum of axillary and pubic hairs was similar to that of the hair shaft and the cortex-medulla interface of the hair shaft. Sudan staining showed dyesome material in the stratum lucidum in both the cortex and the medulla of axillary and pubic hairs. This suggested that lipid-like material is synthesized in the stratum lucidum of hair and probably functions to give strength and elasticity to the hair shaft. The invention relates to a process for the continuous synthesis of acrylonitrile from dimethyl sulfoxide, carbon monoxide and hydrogen cyanide, wherein the synthesis is carried out in the presence of a catalytically active catalyst and with simultaneous recovery and metering of the unreacted components, particularly dimethyl sulfoxide. Among the products which can be prepared in the above-described process, acrylonitrile is of particularly great significance. The continuous f678ea9f9e
